Project summary:

Everyday life as a factor modeling academic careers of women in the Poznań community in the first two decades after the end of World War II

The goal of the project is to determine whether the belief that women's strong involvement in everyday life is an important factor influencing their academic careers is borne out in reality.

The choice of women's academic careers stems from the special role given to science in the social hierarchy and the understanding of research practice as quite different from "ordinary lives".

The chosen period of two post-war decades is special in terms of limited opportunities to meet the basic material needs of everyday life. This situation makes it possible to capture the features of the phenomenon of interest in high intensity.

An additional reason for undertaking the projected research is the desire to capture the power relations constituting the gender order in the Poznań scientific community and their interaction with other power relations in which this community was entangled. Its traditionally high position in the social hierarchy is linked to both its expectations of a certain status in relation to the rest of society and society's expectations of the signs of that status in relation to this group. How were these expectations realized in the face of the material deprivations of the post-war time? Were there gender differences here? How did networks of solidarity and material community support compare to other forms of assistance? How did formal and informal material support networks affect career progression and was there gender variation? Did material status translate into status in the community?
